The Impossible Dream Team

The 1967 Red Sox were a ragtag bunch of misfits and castoffs. Carl Yastrzemski, the team's young left fielder, was coming off a disappointing season and was on the verge of being traded. Jim Lonborg, a promising young pitcher, had struggled with injuries and was considered a bust. And Tony Conigliaro, the team's star right fielder, was recovering from a beaming that had nearly killed him the previous year.

But under the guidance of manager Dick Williams, these misfits and castoffs came together to form a team that was greater than the sum of its parts. Williams, a former Marine who had been a successful manager in the minors, instilled a sense of discipline and teamwork in the Red Sox. He also had a knack for getting the most out of his players.

The Regular Season

The Red Sox began the 1967 season slowly, but they gradually started to play better as the season went on. By the end of the summer, they were in contention for the American League pennant. On September 20, the Red Sox clinched the pennant with a 5-3 victory over the Detroit Tigers. It was the team's first pennant since 1946.

The World Series

The Red Sox faced the St. Louis Cardinals in the World Series. The Cardinals were a heavily favored team, but the Red Sox gave them a run for their money. The series went to seven games, and the Red Sox had a chance to win it in Game 7. But the Cardinals scored two runs in the bottom of the ninth inning to win the game and the World Series.
