During the Year of Terror, thousands of people were executed. The victims included King Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, as well as many other members of the aristocracy and clergy. The Reign of Terror was a time of great fear and uncertainty. No one was safe from the guillotine.

The Reign of Terror was eventually brought to an end by the Thermidorian Reaction. The Thermidorians were a group of moderates who overthrew Robespierre and his followers. The Thermidorian Reaction marked the beginning of a new era in the French Revolution.

Causes of the Year of Terror

There were many factors that contributed to the Reign of Terror. One factor was the war between France and Austria. The war had been going badly for France, and the government was desperate to find a way to turn the tide.

Another factor that contributed to the Reign of Terror was the rise of radicalism. The radical Jacobins were determined to create a new society based on the principles of equality and fraternity. They were willing to use violence to achieve their goals.

Finally, the Reign of Terror was also a product of fear. The government was afraid of counter-revolutionaries, and it used terror to suppress any dissent.

Consequences of the Year of Terror

The Reign of Terror had a profound impact on France. The country was traumatized by the violence and bloodshed. The Revolution also lost its momentum, and the Thermidorians who came to power were more interested in stability than in radical change.

The Reign of Terror is a reminder of the dangers of extremism. It is also a reminder of the importance of due process and the rule of law.
