The Gurindji People

The Gurindji people are an Aboriginal Australian people who have lived in the Wave Hill area of the Northern Territory for thousands of years. Their traditional lands were forcibly taken from them by white settlers in the 19th century, and they were forced to work on cattle stations under harsh conditions.

The Wave Hill Cattle Station

The Wave Hill Cattle Station was established on Gurindji land in 1883. The station was owned by a white family, the McMahons, who treated the Gurindji workers with contempt. The Gurindji were paid starvation wages, given inadequate food and housing, and subjected to physical and verbal abuse.

Vincent Lingiari

Vincent Lingiari was a Gurindji stockman who worked at Wave Hill for many years. He was a respected leader and elder in his community, and he had a deep understanding of the injustices that the Gurindji people were facing.

The Walk Off

In 1966, Lingiari and a group of other Gurindji workers decided to walk off the Wave Hill Station. They had had enough of the mistreatment and exploitation, and they wanted to return to their traditional lands. The walk off was a courageous act of defiance, and it marked the beginning of a long and difficult struggle for Indigenous rights.

The Aftermath

The walk off attracted widespread attention and support, and it helped to raise awareness of the plight of Indigenous Australians. The Australian government was forced to negotiate with the Gurindji people, and in 1975, they were finally granted title to their traditional lands.

Legacy of the Walk Off

The Wave Hill Walk Off is a landmark event in Australian history. It was a victory for Indigenous rights and self-determination, and it inspired other Aboriginal communities to fight for their rights. The walk off also helped to raise awareness of the injustices that Indigenous Australians have faced, and it contributed to the growing movement for reconciliation.

The Wave Hill Walk Off is a story of courage, resilience, and determination. It is a story that reminds us of the importance of fighting for our rights, and it inspires us to continue to work for a more just and equitable society.
